A Dramstle Moment.

It was a dramatic moment when Mr. Dawson appeared on the scene unexpectedly to be sworn in as a witness. Dawson, who was consulting actuary of the Armstrong committee, which investigated the life insurance companies, said that in 1905 he drow up a bill relating to the method of valuation of life insurance policies which afterwards was made a law on the recommendation of the Armstrong committee, although it failed the first year. He went to Albany and had the bill introduced.

"While in the lobby of the Senate," he continued. "Buckley, whom I had known for some years, came to me, life told me that the bill wouldn't pass unless money was provided for the boys." He said that the boys thought I would get a liberal fee and thought I cought to divide with them. I told him I wasn't there to bribe any one-Buckley said he didn't like to have
